Modelling of conjugative transposons: integration and excision. Conjugative transposons carry genetic material as plasmids or phages from one cell to the next during cell growth. The cohesive ends of the element are probably the end-points of DNA transfer, with the DNA being either transcribed to genes or translated into proteins. Heterogeneous transposons are excised only after a second event has occurred, perhaps involving an integrase, in order to regenerate the original plasmid or prophage. We describe a model describing the release of the genetic material from a conjugative transposon, and a model describing the integration of a conjugative transposon into another plasmid or phage. The latter model is extended by inclusion of the possible excision of a conjugative transposon. The model describes the excision and integration steps as occurring in distinct phases, allowing the integrated transposon to be lost by the host cell in a manner analogous to recombination. A prototype simulation of the model shows that it can replicate the known biology of insertion by excision and excision by transposition. Defining biological markers of the prognosis of colorectal cancer. Colorectal cancer is the third leading cause of death from cancer in the world. In the developing world, the incidence of colorectal cancer in high-risk groups is increasing, whereas the incidence in North America and Europe is decreasing.
